I just saw Boris. He said that he had spoken to Bill today about my interest in working at the World Bank. He says Bill thought there were probably some good things we could share across institutions or do better sharing across institutions.

I was kind of non-responsive and agreed that there are always lessons to share etc.

Half an hour later I came up to my office and got a call from the folks at the WB saying that they had heard from the foundation that I was no longer interested in the position and were curious as to whether or not I would be withdrawing my application.

It is a confidential application process (there are 3 people at the WB who know and Steve, and you) and the WB has been very good about trying to keep it that way.

They asked me if I had decided not to keep the process confidential.

Not sure where this is coming from and how it became like this but Steve and I have not told anyone.

This makes me very sad. I have had one real (merit-based opportunity) in the past few years come my way. It is a legitimate position and I feel like I have earned a try to at least apply.

Did you tell Boris anything about the WB? I don't want to ask him because it will just confirm that I have applied. He could be guessing.

Sigh. I asked you please please please not to tell him about the world bank.

Now the job is off.
