But in the end he feels that the road not taken DID make all the difference even if it did make him sigh perhaps with a bit of longing for not taking the well traveled road. I went for a walk with Erik this morning and I shared this with him -- he felt that even though this might be a fair interpretation and likely one I might agree with, that it reflects a slightly morbid sensibility with which we find resonance.

I guess the question is what type of "sigh" is he referring to

..a sigh of relief
..a sigh of regret

Because he does say "and that has made all of the difference."

Which suggests that regardless of the experience taking the road less traveled it did make all the difference. Wouldn't that lead you to believe that he is indicating that it was worth it.
