should you or i write up some questions for the interview? (if you want me to do this then i have the following comments. upon writing that, i realize i have these comments no matter who writes the questions)....and i am not implying the interview shouldn't also be organic and allow for spontaneity, but here you go:

* maybe ALL the interviews should have a similar kind of motif that isn't totally just about the interviewees work. science-y but less descriptive than usual. more about the impact of their work perhaps? or what they would do with a million dollars if they found it on the street? (versus) what would they do with the money if it was publicly granted to them? basically, what will make these interviews different from other interviews these people have done? how are you thinking of injecting your personality into the mix that will make these interviews biting, and maybe slightly (smartly and kindly) awry.
i am not even so sure it should be about money because that seems, well, obvious coming from you. thoughts? [she types.... with little hope for any verbose response, but at least freed of the onus of not having tried].

*should we give some questions to him on monday before tuesday's interview, just to ponder.....so we can maximize our time, efficiency, and the resolution of his answers?

ps. if ever you want my opinion about the SEO project and AI, feel free to ask...i will always be honest with you as long as you understand my limited understanding and appreciate what kind of understanding that takes to admit.

pps. someday maybe we will discuss intuition (sometimes i think you hear a lot more than most people, whereas i see it). actually, this concept - about intuition, be it social, intellectual, psychological....seems very core to you and your success. this may be a very interesting entry point to the interviews b/c you will be able to speak from a place of intimacy - and i bet the scientists will have very colorful and different perspectives on their own intuition(s). some may not even have a grasp of it. this too, would prove good reading.

ppps. perhaps i don't know how to use postscripts. these could have all been in the body of the email. no. there is a difference; i am a person out here - it feels safer in afterthought...
