Greetings Mr. Epstein,

I have attached photos for you regarding what I came across this week, and will outline briefly the series of events:

On Monday, March 19, I went to your Library to see if the Aquarium photos project was in progress or completed. When I saw that the murals were not yet in place, I entered the Library itself to see if John had at least started to prep. The library was extremely warm. Arran was called and appraised of the situation. When I met him on the way to the library, he said he had checked it on Saturday and everything seemed fine. I told him not only did the library feel very warm, but it felt significantly cooler outside, and it was not a very cool day on Monday. I continued with the photographs, but when he caught up with me a little later, he said the thermostat was reading 74 degrees.

Today, March 21, I returned to the library for the aquarium photos since I was told that the project had been completed. I went into the library again to see if it felt any cooler than Monday, which it do not. Sarah's office door was open, so I entered and immediately saw that the thermostat was reading 90 degrees. The dehumidifier indicated that the bucket was full and the humidity reading was high.

I felt it would be irresponsible of me to not bring this type of discovery to your attention, especially since it has been an ongoing issue on your punch list.

Respectfully submitted,

Daphne
