Evolutionary psychology , as it is now defined , is in a sense a game theoretical approach to understanding , less the brain than the strategies it produces. Those survival strategies of both individual and group behaviors are not always easily combined. What might be under one environment the best strategy for the group, might not be in a specific individuals interest. Suicide bomber for example. However it is in the groups interest and therefore a psychology develops that encourages the individual to sacrifice him/herself believing that is is ALSO in his/her interest. If the environment changes, so might the strategy
